

Sick berth
The sick were moved to this light, airy part of the ship forward on the upper gun deck.

Round shot
The ship's cast-iron cannonballs weighed up to 14.5kg (32lb).

Dispensary
The surgeon had a small dispensary forward on the orlop deck, below the lower gun deck. The cockpit, on the same deck, served as his operating theatre.

Ship's hold
The hold is here almost empty, containing gravel for ballast and a few water barrels. However, when full it could store supplies for a six-month voyage.

Wheel and compasses
Aft on the quarterdeck, the double wheel was operated by four men in calm weather but could need the muscle of eight in a storm. In front is the binnacle, holding two compasses.

THE SHIP'S COMMAND CENTRE

The quarterdeck, behind the mainmast, was the site of the commanding officers' cabins, which also served as their offices, and the ship's wheel. Along with the poop deck, which provided a roof for the cabins and a navigation and observation platform, it constituted the command centre of the ship where senior officers were habitually found. Off-duty crew were restricted to the forecastle at the other end of the ship. It was on the quarterdeck that Nelson was shot by a French marine sniper at Trafalgar.

Captain's day cabin
At the stern of the quarterdeck the admiral and the captain both had light and spacious cabins that provided separate areas for sleeping, dining, and working.
