
Bowcase
Carrying strap
Glass bead decoration
Long handle aids reach during battle
Iron tobacco bowl
Stone club
The stone war club or hammer was the Sioux warrior's most prized close-quarters weapon. A direct hit would usually kill a rival warrior outright, or at the very least dismount and weaken them for a follow-up attack.
Pipe tomahawk
The concept of combining a peace pipe and war axe was popular with Native Americans. These tomahawks were carried by chiefs as symbols of prestige and exchanged as diplomatic gifts.
Cutting edge of blade
Carved wooden shaft
Tomahawk
The tomahawk was a type of axe, resembling a hatchet, popular with Native Americans. They were used as general-purpose tools, although not as weapons.
Handle made of animal horn
Fine beadwork stitching
Knife and rawhide sheath
This iron blade, attached to a shaped handle, was a far more effective tool than traditional stone implements. The rawhide sheath that accompanies it is finely stitched with beadwork.
Knife and deerskin sheath
This knife was constructed by attaching a wooden handle to the head of a lance or spear. The sheath has been stitched using softened and dyed porcupine quills.
Deerskin sheath
Wooden handle covered with red cloth