

M16 automatic rifle with M203 grenade launcher
The M16 became the primary infantry rifle of the US Army and Marines in 1967. Soldiers disliked it at first, claiming the rifle was unreliable and the 5.56mm round lacked stopping power. However, it remains in front-line service today.

Claymore mine bag
After planting the antipersonnel mine the Marine would retain the bag as a musette (side bag).

Cotton bandolier
The bandolier shown held M16 magazines for the M16 rifle.

Baseball grenades
Designed to fragment, the grenades contained high explosives and notched wire.

1943 jungle first-aid kit
Marines made use of World War II vintage kits that were used in tropical regions. Malaria was a threat and in addition to insect repellant Marines would have taken a weekly malaria tablet.

Carabiner
Used for abseiling or linking items, the sprung part of the metal ring releases easily but can't spring open unaided.
