

Gatehouse
The gatehouse of the fort of Arbeia, on the Tyne estuary in northern England, has been recontructed to give an impression of its original appearance. Built in the 2nd century CE, the fort became a major supply depot for the troops manning Hadrian's Wall. Although the twin towers are imposing, they are smaller than those at some other Roman forts, which had gatehouses up to four storeys high.