

Male fireflies are an example of a typological species. They emit a pattern of flashes to attract females, who recognize their species' code and flash back—if they wish to mate.

See also: Evolution by natural selection • The role of DNA • The selfish gene • Competitive exclusion principle