transformative lessons, given what has happened in the intervening decades, are plain enough to see.

India can learn something from Japan and China's past modernization experiences, as large non-Western powers that transformed rapidly. Obviously, India's circumstances are different, so other countries' histories offer imperfect blueprints. But what they do indicate is that national transformation, even when successful, is neither painless nor easy. And yet what is also clear is that both Japan and China benefited considerably from various forms of external support. Japan's opening would have been impossible without importing industrial techniques from Europe and accessing the US market. China gained from its diaspora outreach efforts in Southeast Asia, its import of technical skills and knowledge from Hong Kong, its exposure to countries like Japan, and unprecedented global market access, including to the United States and Europe. If India could take one lesson from these experiences, it would be that modernization efforts cannot be accomplished entirely on one's own. Just as its foreign policy begins at home, India's domestic policy will have to have an inherently international character.
