post-fossil fuel future, using their oil and gas riches to invest in emerging technologies. When these trends are considered together, the post-‘Arab Spring’ environment has opened up the possibility of economic integration; robust trade, technology, and people-to-people ties; and security and intelligence cooperation between India and several regional partners.

For India, today, ‘thinking West’ will require at least three separate and interlocking lines of effort. With Pakistan, India’s objective involves compelling a nuclear-armed revisionist state to abandon its longstanding policy of using terrorism for political objectives. This is a tall order, particularly given that Pakistan’s military leadership sees few incentives to change course. This will therefore require India to use all its available positive and negative leverage. A second, and related, effort will require India to continue engaging Afghanistan within its limited means and capabilities, so as to prevent it from becoming a haven for terrorist activity targeting India. Finally, in the broader West Asian region, India will have to continue to balance its diverse interests: with Israel on defence, technology and democracy; with Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and other Gulf Arab states on diaspora, energy, trade, investment, business, and counterterrorism interests; and with Iran on connectivity to Central Asia and Afghanistan. The Abraham Accords—the normalization between Israel, and several Arab states led by the United Arab Emirates—has opened room for India to invest in some of these relationships simultaneously. Moreover, the prospect of an India–Middle East–Europe Economic Corridor (IMEC) could increase connectivity and reshape the broader region in some fundamental ways by linking India with the Gulf, Israel and Mediterranean.

Priority 9. Compel Pakistan

The origins of India’s problems with Pakistan are long and complex. Differences over territory and identity stemming from Partition remained, but areas of convergence and even cooperation could be found between 1948 and the early 1960s. Such cooperation extended to the division of financial and water resources, the peaceful resolution of some boundary
