and regional trade agreements, and supply chain arrangements. Beyond tariffs, such arrangements sometimes extend to trade facilitation, licensing, subsidies (especially in agriculture), trade in services, and regulatory restrictiveness.

As this brief overview illustrates, in many of these cases, legacy institutions governing the international security order, the governance of the global commons, and the international economic order are fraying or no longer always fit for purpose. This is often a result of their design or leadership, or in other cases simply a product of greater global contestation on important issues. For India, it is important to distinguish between these two causes of flailing multilateralism. In part, their ineffectiveness is due to traditional powers that lead and manage these institutions being unwilling to accommodate rising powers such as India. This has required India to either forge coalitions to advocate for institutional reform, such as the G-4 with Japan, Brazil, and Germany to advocate for the expansion of the UN Security Council, or back alternative institutions, such as the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB).

At the same time, India faces resistance at many organizations from revisionist states or other powers that seek to fundamentally overturn an institution and its objectives. For example, China has blocked India's entry to the Nuclear Suppliers Group (NSG), not supported it at the UN Security Council, and advanced international efforts such as the Belt and Road Initiative without stakeholder consultations. These two distinct causes for the vacuum in global governance today will require India to advocate for reforming institutions rather than overturning or undermining their purposes. In other words, India will often act as a reformist—but not a revisionist—power on matters of global governance.

In many respects, despite its frustrations with the unfairness of legacy institutions and agreements, India has much to gain from a well-functioning international order. Under the right circumstances, greater socialization among states and growing consent can help dilute adversarial competition and render considerable benefits. For all its shortcomings, the period between the end of the Cold War in 1991 and the onset of the global
