of such movement risks making the UN more irrelevant and unable to fulfil the obligation of its charter to shield future generations from the prospect of devastating war, ensure respect for treaties and international commitments, and promote social progress and human dignity. Not making the UN representative of the world of the twenty-first century would also grant more legitimacy to non-UN bodies, whether regional groupings or institutions such as the G-20.

The UN system is not the only multilateral body in dire need of reform, from India's standpoint. The United States and Europe have been reluctant to cede voting and other powers at the IMF and World Bank. While India sought alternatives to these bodies, it has also tried to use its G-20 presidency to reinvigorate the World Bank, in particular. By broadening that institution's mandate and enabling greater public–private financing potential, India has tried to support the World Bank's transition into a more effective body to achieve the development, technological, and sustainability objectives now needed.

India has been an active participant in the G-20 and tried to take the most advantage of its presidency in 2022–23 to ensure consensus among the world's leading economies on political and development issues. It also tried to highlight the value of digital public infrastructure and sustainable development, along with institutional reform. By working in the troika format, with the preceding and succeeding presidencies of Indonesia and Brazil, India has tried to embed these objectives as part of long-term efforts. In addition, India has been a frequent participant (although not a member) of G-7 discussions and at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. While these groups represent advanced economies, India has worked with the latter in particular on artificial intelligence (through the Global Partnership on Artificial Intelligence) and energy (by engaging with the International Energy Agency). Separately, India has also coordinated with the Club of Paris—a group of which it is not a member—on lending standards as a creditor.

There are also older entities related to export controls and weapons of mass destruction. Although India is unlikely to sign the Nuclear Non-
