Proliferation Treaty (NPT) except as a recognized nuclear weapon state, it has largely adhered to its principles. India is now a full member of most major export control regimes but will have to continue advocating for membership of the Nuclear Suppliers Group (NSG), which has been resisted by China. Finally, there is an opportunity for India to take a bigger leadership role at two legacy institutions: the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) and the Commonwealth. Although their purpose and utility are increasingly in question, India now presents the largest economy in both organizations. This presents it with an opportunity to repurpose these groupings to make them more relevant to the present day.

Priority 13. Build New Coalitions

While India can do its fair share to reform legacy multilateral entities, new issues also present an opportunity for India to take the lead in building coalitions. Some of these groupings are smaller and focused on specific issues and outcomes, reflecting varying degrees of formality and structure. For example, BRICS represented one early effort. In that case, it was a venue for non-western economies to advocate for better representation on international economic matters. The reluctance of established powers to make institutions more representative contributed to the creation of the BRICS New Development Bank (NDB). Although BRICS has expanded to include new members such the United Arab Emirates, Ethiopia, Iran, and Egypt, the agenda has diluted and focused on preserving member states' sovereignty. Although each member has different priorities when it comes to sovereignty, one area of convergence involves finding alternatives to the dollar for international trade. Over time, the NDB's limits also prompted China to establish the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB). India, recognizing the need for greater infrastructure financing and noting what were initially serious commitments by China to build accountable governance structures, has the second-largest voting share in that organization. Another China-led grouping of which India is a member is the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO), which has proved an important
