attempted to place food, energy, and health security, supply chains, sustainable lending, and climate justice more squarely on the G20 agenda and worked to permanently include the African Union in that grouping.

The Global South thus represents a strategic opportunity for India to advance its own development objectives along with global institutional reform. By amplifying the concerns of the Global South, India can advance both its interests and its values, in part because the shared agenda also serves India's interests. The Global South is also not necessarily an anti-western construct, as some imagine. But India believes its status as a developing country along with its capabilities in the aggregate enable it to serve as a bridging power between the West and the Global South.

In addition to global efforts, India has attempted to bolster its outreach to the Global South through regional conferences and engagements. This includes the India–ASEAN Summit, periodic India–Africa Summits, meetings with all five Central Asian leaders, the Forum on India and Pacific Island Countries (FIPIC), as well as lower-level engagement with the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) and Latin America. These should not simply be meetings held for symbolic purposes but offer concrete opportunities for cooperation between India and key regional blocs on trade, investment, loans, technical assistance, energy, and natural resources. Building goodwill among these constituencies also helps India advance its global governance agenda.

In conclusion, the world represents considerable opportunities and diverse challenges for a rising India. The outlines of its approach to international affairs are clear, involving enhancing its own power, security, and influence; managing its periphery; ensuring a stable regional balance of power; reshaping the difficult region to its west; and assuming a growing role in global governance. While remaining conscious of its resource advantages and limitations, India must focus on key priorities. For the growing cohort of practitioners and professionals in Indian foreign policy—both in and out of government—understanding those priorities amid changing global circumstances will be crucial. Equally, others—including
