For my experiences at Brookings India between 2016 and 2019, when I initially conceived of and began writing this book, I am obliged to Vikram Singh Mehta, Harsha V. Singh, Rakesh Mohan, Shivshankar Menon, Shamika Ravi and Rahul Tongia. My perch in New Delhi in those years allowed me to traverse the length and breadth of India, interact with a variety of stakeholders and engage policymakers all over South and Southeast Asia. The sections on the Act East Policy, Indo–Pacific, Indian Ocean and India–US relations draw from some of my research during this time. Various colleagues at the Brookings Institution in Washington were also supportive of my efforts: Martin Indyk, Strobe Talbott and Bruce Jones encouraged me to write this book, and I am grateful to several anonymous reviewers of an earlier draft for their candid feedback.

After 2019, Samir Saran and Sunjoy Joshi gave me a chance at the Observer Research Foundation (ORF) to create a new institution, which became ORF America in Washington, D.C. The board of directors and my colleagues at ORF America have been extraordinarily supportive, but I want to single out Sharon Stirling, who helped tremendously in the organization's establishment and administration, thus giving me the time and space for creative and intellectual endeavours. Over many years, I drew inspiration from conversations with hundreds of policymakers, officials, and scholars from India and elsewhere. But I want to particularly acknowledge Tanvi Madan, Anit Mukherjee and Constantino Xavier for their many years of professional support and generous friendship.

Last, but not least, I want to thank my family. In their own ways, all four of my grandparents—Sulochana and K. Subrahmanyam and Lalita and K.S. Krishnan—and my late mother Shobha Jaishankar taught me a lot about India, its history, culture, and society. I remain in awe of their fierce intellects and rich perspectives. My immediate family—Kyoko and S. Jaishankar, Medha and Arjun—have been constant companions and sources of inspiration and humour. Most importantly, I want to express my immense gratitude to my wife, Cassandra, for her love, support, patience, and intellectual companionship. My children, Vivica and Darius, are everything to me. I hope this book and its contents prove a modest contribution to their
